The international relations major is designed to develop an appreciation for the multi-disciplinary aspects of international affairs. The curriculum exposes students to political questions about security, diplomacy, and power relations among nations; the nature of political life in other societies; the development of economic relationships within and between nations; the historical and cultural origins of American, European, Asian, Latin American, and African nations; and requires proficiency in foreign language. While not directly vocational in nature, the international relations major prepares students for graduate and professional schools, for careers in international and regional agencies and organizations in the public and private sectors, and for the foreign service.

Majors in international relations must complete a minimum of fourteen (14) courses from five (5) academic areas: politics, history, economics, foreign languages, and culture area studies. There are four specific required courses: POL 130, POL 453, ECO 202, and ECO 203. In order to prepare adequately for senior capstone seminar, international relations majors must have completed at least seven (7) courses in the major, including courses in comparative and international politics, and in foreign policy. Therefore, transfer students and those with A.A. degrees should assume that it will take at least two years to complete the major.

Seniors graduating in December must take the capstone seminar during the previous spring term. Students are strongly encouraged to participate in one of the Rollins-sponsored study-abroad programs and/or in the Foreign Policy Seminar at American University in Washington, D.C. The program coordinator tries to facilitate these activities by counting appropriate courses from these programs toward the major at Rollins.

Fourteen (14) courses are required. At least one-half of these courses must be 300-400 level (two must be in the same area).

Two (2) courses are required in a modern language at the 200 intermediate level. The courses must be conducted in that language, with the purpose of achieving reading and conversational proficiency (courses in translation may not be counted). If either intermediate level course is waived, an appropriate 300- or 400-level course will be required.
